surplus poison should be deeply buried in the ground.

Naturally there was much apprehension of evil from such free use of arsenic when the remedy was first put into practice. Very careful analyses were made at the university laboratory of the washings of vine leaves, Srapes, and of the soil beneath the vines, and no dangerous amounts of arsenic were found, nor did there appear any danger of contaminating wells or other sources of water. Of course domestic animals and fowls must be faithfully looked to while the poison is exposed, and it is chiefly for their protection that the use of shisgles in putting out the poison, instead of throwing it on the ground, is advocated.
